

The End

7 0 1

Chapter 1 by Danielle Charles

This was it. The end of the world. It's not nearly as exciting as the movies would have you believe. The others, as we called them, had shown up a week before as a green disc in the sky. The world froze for about a day and then everything went on as normal. People still went to work and school and governments tried to operate as normal as they could while trying to figure out what was going on. Some people left town of course, scared being this close to one of the biggest cities in the south, but most stayed. The news was constantly talking about the others and almost everyone had an opinion about them or a guess about who they were, but to be honest no one knew.

Time went on and this became the new normal. As humans we are a pretty adaptable bunch, moving from one normal to another till the past was barely recognizable.

I sit in 5th period math, paying little attention to the teacher but instead talking to Brooke and Patrick who sit beside me. All of the sudden the power goes out, it startles everyone and someone in the back of the class screams. I reach for my phone to find some explanation but the screen stays dark. Then a crash sounds outside. We rush to the window much to the disapproval of the teacher, cars are going out of control and crashing into each other. Nothing out side has power. Nothing.
